My Mental Wellness Plan

By Laura Jane Hyte-Garner, MSN, APRN, PMHNP-BC

Small Changes. Chosen by Me.

You've now looked at several things that can influence mental wellness:

Sleep • Movement • Food & Hydration • Caffeine • Connection • Stress • Substances • Hobbies

• Medication

You do not need to improve all of them.

Trying to change everything at once usually doesn't create lasting change.

Instead, we're going to choose a few things that matter most to you.

Start With Your Why

Go back to your My Starting Point page.

You answered this question:

If one thing improved over the next month, what would make the biggest difference in my life?

Write it here:

Now ask:

Why does that matter to me?

Maybe you want to:

Feel like yourself again.

Be more present with your children.

Finish school.

Keep your job.

Repair a relationship.

Stay in recovery.

Sleep normally.

Have energy again.

Feel interested in life.

Be able to concentrate.

Your reason matters.

Choose Your Priorities

Look through this toolkit.

Which areas feel most important right now?

Choose no more than three.

Sleep

Movement

Food / nutrition

Hydration

Caffeine

Nicotine

Alcohol/cannabis/other substances

Medication consistency

Stress regulation

Connection / relationships

Hobbies / enjoyment

Recovery support

Something else: _____

Goal #1 — BODY

Choose something that supports your physical foundation.

Examples:

Walk for 10 minutes after work.

Eat something with protein in the morning.

Move my last caffeine earlier.

Get outside after waking.

Drink more water during the day.

My Body Goal

I will try this:

_____ days this week.

Goal #2 — BRAIN

Choose something that supports your mental or emotional health.

Examples:

Use a grounding strategy when anxiety increases.

Track my sleep.

Take my medication consistently.

Spend 10 minutes on a hobby.

Break an overwhelming task into one physical action.

My Brain Goal

I will try this:

_____ days this week.

Goal #3 — CONNECTION & MEANING

Choose something that helps you reconnect with people, purpose, recovery, spirituality, creativity, or enjoyment.

Examples:

Call someone I trust.

Attend a recovery meeting.

Go to church or another community activity.

Have dinner with someone.

Return to a hobby.

Volunteer.

Spend time outside.

My Connection / Meaning Goal

I will try this:

_____ days this week.

Make the Goal Smaller

Look at your three goals.

Now ask:

"Could I still do this on a difficult day?"

If the answer is no, make it smaller.

Instead of:

Exercise every day.

Try:

Walk for 10 minutes three times this week.

Instead of:

Fix my sleep.

Try:

Get out of bed within the same 30-minute window on weekdays.

Instead of:

Stop isolating.

Try:

Text one person on Wednesday.

Instead of:

Eat healthy.

Try:

Add protein to breakfast three days this week.

Small and specific usually beats ambitious and vague.

Plan for the Bad Day

Motivation changes.

Your plan shouldn't depend entirely on feeling motivated.

If I'm having a difficult day, my MINIMUM goal is:

Examples:

Walk to the mailbox.

Take a shower.

Eat something.

Take my medication as prescribed.

Text one person.

Stand outside for five minutes.

Attend my appointment.

Minimum goals still count.

What Might Get in the Way?

My biggest obstacle will probably be:

If that happens, I will:

This is called an if–then plan.

For example:

If I forget to eat because I'm hyperfocused, then I'll set a noon alarm.

If I want to isolate after work, then I'll text someone before going home.

If I want to skip my walk, then I'll agree to five minutes instead.

If I'm craving a substance, then I'll contact _____ before deciding what to do.

Who Is On My Team?

Mental wellness doesn't have to be a solo project.

People who support me:

Healthcare professionals involved in my care:

Community / recovery / spiritual support:

Someone I can contact when I'm struggling:

One Month From Now

Imagine that these small changes are helping.

What would I notice?

What would someone close to me notice?

What would I be doing that I'm not doing now?

My Commitment to Myself

This month I am not committing to perfection.

I am committing to:

Paying attention.

Trying small changes.

Being honest about what works and what doesn't.

Bringing what I learn back to treatment.

My first step is:

I will start on: _____

The Ischys Takeaway

Treatment isn't about becoming perfect.

It's about making your life more manageable, meaningful, healthy, and yours.

Choose something small enough to begin.

Then:
